

YouTube Censors Think Tank For Disagreeing With WHO

YouTube, which is owned by Google, has removed a video by a leading think tank merely because it features views at odds with the current position of the World Health Organisation. Townhall has more:

The Hoover Institution at Stanford University is one of the most prominent think tanks in America, and its fellows are some of the most accomplished in their respective fields. But that doesn't matter to Big Tech. YouTube recently removed a June 23 interview its senior fellow Dr. Scott Atlas did with Hoover because it goes against the World Health Organisation's position on the Wuhan coronavirus. ...

Atlas has continued to be a much-needed voice against the prevailing coronavirus wisdom. In a recent op-ed, he reminded readers that "only 0.2% of U.S. deaths have been people younger than 25, and 80% have been in people over 65; the average fatality age is 78." We've come a long way since Spring and yet the economy isn't fully open, he said.

"While the lockdown may have been justified at the start, when little data was known, we know far more about the virus today," Atlas concluded. "It's time we use all we have learned and all we have done to re-open our schools and our economy safely and get back to restoring America."

It is perverse to ban anything that happens to be at odds with the WHO's current position, not only because it is crucial to hear more than one point of view, but because the WHO can't stop changing its mind

Freedom section plus Health

Editor